

Dear FCC Commissioners & Staff:

As a customer, I'm happy to enjoy a service from an independant ISP that has no equivalent offering from local phone companies. If fair access is removed, I doubt my local phone co will have any incentive to offer the same service at anywhere near the same price point.

With lack of competition, everyone loses.

Broadband service adoption is already slow in the US compared to much of asia and europe. Why remove even more incentive for the market to develop?

The phone network has been created as a public trust. As part of the public, I will feel quite cheated if I'm not offered reasonable options for the services I know are possible at the prices possible.

Sincerely,

Jason Watkins
